What supports strong family relationships?

Two main dimensions of the parenting role have been found to have important effects on family relationships and on children's development, no matter what kind of family children are 1- in. These are:

- communicating with warmth and 2-
- establishing clear and appropriate limits for children's 3-

Positive styles of communication are a common element that 4- both of these dimensions. All families experience ups and 5- as they strive to do their best for children and 6- challenges that come along. A recent study asked Australian families of different kinds to nominate what they considered to be the characteristics that made their families 7- in spite of any difficulties they might face. The results have shown that loyalty, love, 7- and spending time together are the most important values that help establish a well-balanced family.

Technology is evolving so quickly that many of us are barely aware of how our behavior is changing and how our most important relationships are threatened. You're driving down a city street and find yourself stuck (above-up-behind) someone going 15 mph below the speed limit. What's your first thought? That guy needs to get off his cell phone! You're sitting in the stands at a high school football game. You notice that (many-most-much) of the students are not only ignoring the game but they're also ignoring the friends seated beside (they-theirs-them)—instead they are busy (exchanging- writing-texting) other friends. You walk through an airport concourse and notice a man pacing back (and-but-so) forth, waving his hands while he talks (on-at-in) his cell phone in a voice that bounces off the walls 30 yards away. That's why I hope they never allow people to make calls with their cell phones on a flight. In the last 15 years the cell phone (conquered-has conquered-will conquer) the world. I could make a list of 50 ways these phones have improved our lives. But if you're like me and can (remember-forget- mention) what life was like before we all got cell phones, you may wonder if all the changes are really for the good. Remember those days when you could go to a movie and not worry about being (distracted- addicted-hooked) by ringing phones or by the white glow of someone texting a friend?

3. Supply the correct tense or form of the bracketed words.

The factors that help couples make their marriages successful are now the subject of urgent research. (Be) marriage more suitable for some people than others? Recent work reveals that happily married couples are (much) willing to compromise than people who have (divorce) They have less difficulty in accepting that their partner has faults and do not expect their relationships to be perfect. Researchers have also made the discovery that people (real) do change as they get older. Surprisingly, when a person says to their partner, 'You're not the person I married,' it is likely to be the (truthful) But some people have a (greatness) ability to accept their partners' changes than others. Again, psychologists tell (we) that people with happy marriages tend to be a lot more tolerant than those who have made the difficult decision to divorce. The (evident) does seem to suggest that divorcees are more demanding than those who stay married.

Friends Reunited

Have you ever wondered what your old school-mates are doing now? Well plenty of people in Britain do. One of the most successful internet ventures in Britain has shown how popular, and how fruitful, memories can be.

The website Friends Reunited was started for fun in 1999 by a couple who were interested to know what their old school friends were doing. The project developed and by 2005, the site had 12 million members. One extraordinary fact is that Friends Reunited has never advertised, its success is entirely due to word-of-mouth.

You can search for a school, college or university and find a list of the members who were there in any year. You can also post a personal profile showing what you are doing now, and read other people's details.

Steve Pankhurst, one of the founders of the site, thinks that one of the reasons for its success is that some people like to be anonymous. On Friends Reunited, you can snoop on other people's lives without giving away anything about yourself if you don't want to. It's also an opportunity to strengthen your self-esteem by showing off to everyone just how successful and happy you are now, even if you weren't while you were at school.

Friends Reunited has also led to many successful school reunions, and people meeting up with each other after many years. In particular, many people use the site to look up their childhood sweethearts and many couples have actually revived relationships after contacting each other through the site.

There have even been Friends Reunited weddings and babies, and Friends Reunited now has a new site called Friends Reunited Dating especially for people who are looking for love. The company has also launched other sites, such as Genes Reunited, which helps people to find long-lost relatives and build their family trees online.
