Read the text below and answer the questions

Caroline Halladay, a mother of a teenage girl, wrote the following letter to a British magazine to explain how she feels when she and her daughter have a fight.

My daughter Nancy, makes me cry sometimes. She is 14. I am a working mother and I feel the pressure of trying to meet her needs especially after my husband's death. I usually take her to school in the morning on my way to work and we don't meet until late in the afternoon. When I come home, I find her there doing her homework. I'm busy with the housework and I sometimes get angry with her because she's untidy. We usually talk a lot at supper but when I'm tired I find it difficult to listen to her problems because I, too, feel the need of support and cooperation. We occasionally have a fight and last week we had a bad one but there were obvious reasons for it. I had to work late most evenings. So, she didn't have the chance to talk to me about school, friends and other problems in her life. I know that our quarrel was about quite irrelevant things such as clothes or make-up and untidiness.

I was so sorry about that unpleasant evening that now I'm more concerned with things that matter a lot, like her physical safety, her views on life and her important choices and decisions. My daughter, too, is now sharing the cooking and is kinder to me.

I hope this letter may be useful to other mothers and teenagers.

Read Joana's blog and e-mail her back to advise her and her father to lend a helping hand to do housework in order to improve their family relationship.

Hi everyone,
I'm fed up with my parents. I have nothing with them but problems. They are always fighting over household chores. My mother is always on her nerves. She says that we never help her with housework which she thinks is tiring and demanding. My father says he is a man and he is not expected to do any chores. As for me I'm always busy studying. What can I do? Please help.
Joana
