The text

Three-year-old 'genius' becomes one of the youngest people to be accepted into Mensa*.

When little Haryz uttered his first words at just seven months old, his mum Anira knew he was going to be special. By two, the youngster – whose full name is Muhammad Haryz Nadzim – was reading himself bedtime stories. By the time he was in nursery, he could read the whole of some of his favourite storybooks'. Now, the little brainbox has become the current youngest person to be accepted into Mensa, the global high IQ society.

'We didn't have much experience, so we just thought that's how kids were,' Anira tells Metro.co.uk. 'It was only when he started going to nursery, we were told he is more advanced than other children, then we realised that he was special. We didn't want him to feel under-stimulated. We wanted him to be a normal child who plays and does normal things that children do.'

After realising that Haryz could remember and recite entire stories at the age of two, his parents set up a YouTube channel called Little Haryz, so other children could watch and be encouraged. 'He is very much a three-year-old in every other sense,' Anira tells us. 'He enjoys jumping , painting, singing, all the normal stuff for a child of that age. 'Haryz loves to ask questions and talks about space and numbers, and he loves reading books.' What's even more remarkable about Haryz intellect and love of reading, is that English isn't even his first language. 'We communicate with him in the Malay language at home,' explains Anira.

Haryz has now been invited to join British Mensa after achieving an incredible IQ score of 142 on the Stanford Binet test . The family is delighted that Haryz has been accepted into Mensa, and they hope this is the first step in his journey towards further achievements. 'It's exciting and we are sure this will help him get little confidence in himself so he can better benefit society in the future, ' says his mother.
